A Conclusive Synopsis on Spiritual Principles

PETER C. ROGERS D.D., Ph.D

If I were to say that a word spoken has power, would you believe me? If I told you that a word, in itself, is merely a particular frequency, resonating at a certain vibrational level, would you understand me? Did you know that the purpose of a word is to provide the framework for an energetic expression? Therefore, we try to encapsulate the energetic tone of a specific thing into phonetics, which is nothing more than sound frequencies. The only problem is oftentimes, the meaning we ascribe to a particular word does not do it justice in the energetic sense. In fact, most spoken languages pale in comparison to ancient systems of communication where thoughts and ideas were transmitted telepathically, or from one mind to the next.

In advanced societies, thoughts are communicable and the use of spoken words as a medium is not necessary. Advanced races do not communicate using spoken words, because they fail to communicate the proper tone or energy that needs to be transmitted. When spoken language was born, two things occurred, 1) we lost touch with our kinetic abilities and 2) we began to separate ourselves through different languages. Many people believe speaking and writing are the primary indications of an advanced society; however, in truth, they merely reflect signs of a primitive race. In keeping with this understanding, every word I write here is used to transmit the essence of what I'm feeling and sensing. I search my vocabulary and the dictionary to find the exact words to convey the energy I am experiencing, but the exact feeling gets lost in translation through my word choice. The reason for this is that the words I use have different associations and meanings. Webster's Dictionary can often have five or six different meanings for the same word—and here again I'm endeavoring to use yet more words to convey the energy, or essence, of what I want to express. However, if I could transfer the feeling tone, then misinterpretation would not occur.

For example, if I say the word HATE, although it means, an intense dislike, the very vibration of the word HATE can be felt. How the vibration of the word hate resonates with each person is entirely different altogether. Conversely, if I were to say the word LOVE, you can feel the tone or the vibration shift dramatically. Try this for yourself. First, say the word HATE. Try to get a sense for how this tone resonates in your being. If you had to describe the essence associated with this feeling tone, how would you describe it? Now, say the word LOVE. Feel the difference? The air in the room changes instantly and the vibrational tone shifts dramatically from one end of the spectrum to the other by introducing a new tone or frequency.

Dr. Michael Bernard Beckwith, founder of the Agape International Spiritual Center says in his book 40 Day Mind Fast Soul Feast that, “The words we speak are filled with our energy. The truth contained in our words determines their vibratory potency. To the degree that we attune ourselves to the vibratory frequencies of love, compassion, truth, discernment and honesty, a vibration will go forth from us that contributes to the upliftment of our own consciousness and the collective consciousness.”
